

Austra Bertha Flores weeps over the casket of her daughter, Honduran indigenous rights and environmental activist Berta Cáceres, during her 2016 funeral Mass in La Esperanza, Honduras. (CNS/EPA)

by Catholic News Service

View Author Profile

Join the Conversation

Send your thoughts to Letters to the Editor. Learn more

Tegucigalpa, Honduras — November 30, 2018

Share on FacebookShare on TwitterEmail to a friendPrint

A Honduran court found seven men guilty of the murder of indigenous human rights and environmental advocate Berta Cáceres.

An eighth defendant was cleared and freed in the trial that ended Nov. 29.

Cáceres, who founded the Council of Indigenous Peoples of Honduras in 1993, was murdered in her home in La Esperanza early March 3, 2016, two days before her 45th birthday, in what police initially called an attempted robbery.

The Lenca indigenous leader was internationally known for her opposition to the Agua Zarca hydroelectric dam on the Gualcarque River in western Honduras. Construction of the dam would have flooded large areas of land and cut off food and water supplies for hundreds of people.

Cáceres' efforts earned her the 2015 Goldman Environmental Prize, an award considered the Nobel for ecological actions.

Judges in the case determined that two of the convicted assailants who worked for the company building the dam had planned the killing along with a former Honduran army soldier. The company, Desa, has denied any involvement.

Advertisement

The court said Desa executives ordered the killing because of delays and financial losses linked to protests led by Cáceres. The murder was contracted to a group of hitmen who were paid to kill the activist, court records showed.

The Guardian reported that the verdict was welcomed by Cáceres' family and colleagues, but they continued to press for prosecutions of those who planned and financed the plot.

Sentencing for the seven is scheduled for January.

A ninth defendant, an executive with the construction company, is awaiting trial in the case.