Australian court upholds Cardinal Pell's conviction on abuse charges:

Vatican correspondent Joshua McElwee covered late-breaking news last evening, that Australian judges upheld the conviction of Cardinal George Pell for sexually assaulting two choirboys in the 1990s. As he reports, Pell is "the first Vatican official charged by authorities on abuse allegations, the first convicted, and the first sentenced to jail. He is now also the first to lose on appeal."

Michael Sean Winters will be responding to the Pell verdict in today's Distinctly Catholic column. It will be posted soon and available here.

Ministerial exception often protects church employers from lawsuits over firings: NCR news editor Peter Feuerherd writes about a legal doctrine that essentially offers church employers "a legal way out of liability" to church workers who feel they have been unjustly dismissed from their positions.

Dennis McDaniel reviews Heartland: A Memoir of Working Hard and Being Broke in the Richest Country on Earth. For the current election cycle, McDaniel advises, "Democrats would be wise to heed Sarah Smarsh's analysis in her memoir" of the white working poor.
