

Spirituality

Pencil Preaching

by Pat Marrin

View Author Profile

patrickjmarrin@gmail.com.

Join the Conversation

Send your thoughts to Letters to the Editor. Learn more

May 31, 2021

Share on FacebookShare on TwitterEmail to a friendPrint

Give to Caesar what is Caesar's and to God what is God's (Mark 12:16).

Tobit 2:9-14; Mark 12:13-17

Jesus' famous words about giving to Caesar and to God have been the starting point for endless debates about the separation of the church and state, the obligations Christians have to civil society and religion, the tensions inherent in paying taxes to fund war, living in the world and keeping a spiritual focus, or just about the ethics of money. God or Caesar? Just what belongs to Caesar and what belongs to God?

The setting for the original question was a deliberate trap set by the Pharisees and the Herodians to get Jesus in trouble with either his Jewish followers who hated the Roman occupation or with the Roman authorities, always alert to potential troublemakers.

It was a clever ploy, but Jesus' response went much deeper than the political and religious dilemmas that defined life in Palestine at the time.

Jesus asks to see the Roman coin used to pay taxes. It is readily produced by one of his critics, exposing their complicity in the system. Jesus' answer was simple: If you use the system, pay. But then he goes to the heart of the dilemma. Whose image do you define yourself by? The image on the coin is that of Caesar, the supreme ruler of the world. Can this image supersede the essential image and likeness of God, absolute creator of everything? It is this deeper imprint that determines who we are and why we are in the world. Even Caesar is subject to this absolute reality.

So go figure. We carry the dilemma into our daily lives and dealings. We benefit from all the interlocking secular systems that hold the world of commerce and civil society together. We belong to our banks as much as we do to our churches for the capacity to function. The challenge is to remember who we really are and to whom we must give an accounting.

The image we prize most will decide who we are and become. To bear the family resemblance of God is our ultimate reality and our guiding principle. Where there is a conflict, toss a coin. God is on both sides and owns everything.

--Reprinted from 2015

Advertisement