

News

A group of people stand outside around bodies fully wrapped in cloth

Men pray near bodies of earthquake victims during their funeral in Jandaris, Syria, Feb. 7, 2023. (OSV News photo/Reuters)

Doreen Abi Raad

View Author Profile

OSV News

View Author Profile

Join the Conversation

Send your thoughts to Letters to the Editor. Learn more

Beirut — February 8, 2023

Share on BlueskyShare on FacebookShare on TwitterEmail to a friendPrint

In response to the devastating earthquake that struck northern Syria Feb. 6, the patriarchs and heads of churches in the country demanded the lifting of "unjust sanctions" on the Syrian people, calling for "exceptional measures" to secure delivery of humanitarian aid.

"We, the three patriarchs with the heads of churches in Syria, demand from the United Nations and the countries imposing sanctions on Syria to lift the embargo and the unjust sanctions imposed on the Syrian people, and to take exceptional measures and immediate initiatives to secure the delivery of the much-needed relief and humanitarian aid," the church leaders said in a statement.

"We appeal to governments, international organizations, NGOs, charities, and peace advocates everywhere to expedite the support of relief and rescue efforts, irrespective of any political consideration," the prelates said.

The three patriarchs based in Syria are Melkite Catholic Patriarch Joseph Absi; Syriac Orthodox Patriarch Ignatius Aphrem II and Greek Orthodox Patriarch John X.

"We also appeal to the conscience of all the people of goodwill to advocate on behalf of the Syrians in order to put an end to their misery and enable them to live in dignity as envisioned by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights," the prelates said.

"This natural disaster adds to the ordeal of the Syrian people," the Syrian church leaders stressed, adding that the people continue to suffer "from the tragedies of war, crises, disasters, epidemics, and the harsh economic hardships."

"We pray for the victims and their families, asking the Lord to grant rest to the souls of the departed and recovery to the wounded. We, likewise, pray for all those working in the fields of relief, rescue, and hospitalization," the prelates said.

The earthquake that hit northwestern Syria and south Turkey in the early morning hours of Feb. 6 left at least 11,000 people dead and thousands more trapped under the rubble.

According to the expert quoted by the Associated Press, hope is fading with every hour of search.

"The first 72 hours are considered to be critical," Steven Godby, a natural hazards expert at Nottingham Trent University in England, told the AP.

"The survival ratio on average within 24 hours is 74%, after 72 hours it is 22% and by the fifth day it is 6%."

At the same time, he said it was too soon to abandon hope.

Sako Khaloyian recalled the terror of the night of the earthquake. "We were so frightened," he told OSV News.

The 35-year-old Armenian Catholic was most worried about his wife, who is 36 weeks pregnant.

"I was very concerned about her. I was trying to protect her with my body.

Advertisement

When the huge tremor stopped, broken glass was everywhere in their apartment.

First, they went to a relative's home nearby, but still fearing the aftermath of tremors, they took their car and went to a nearby schoolyard, filled with cars of other residents seeking safety.

"It's an open space, not close to buildings or trees, anything that might fall," he said. Aftershocks were continuing, however.

"Whenever the aftershocks are occurring, we fear it might be a big one," he said. "For now, it is decreasing. Hopefully, it will stop."

"All the churches have opened their halls and are providing shelter," Khaloyian said, but for himself and his wife, the schoolyard was the nearest possible option.

Despite the fear of aftershocks, the couple returned briefly to their apartment. "My wife started to feel tired after sitting so long and had to lay down. We are on the second floor, so we can escape fast."

"The worst fear is not knowing what to expect," Khaloyian said. "After 12 years of war, a terrible economic situation, and now this earthquake, we've been going through a lot of hard times."

"Faith is the only thing that is holding us together. We are praying and believing that God will protect us during these hard times, as he always did," Khalorian said.

Syria has been devastated, even before the earthquake, by more than a decade of conflict and a dire economic situation. Now, to make things worse, international economic sanctions placed on a regime in power are stopping aid.

"The situation is awful," Riad Sarji, executive director of Caritas Syria, told OSV News.

While churches, convents and mosques are hosting people, there are still thousands who are in the open air or staying in their cars, fearful of returning to their apartments, he said.

More than 120 buildings in Aleppo are completely destroyed and more than a thousand buildings have cracks.

"People are afraid to go back to their homes. They are afraid of aftershocks and the danger that their building will collapse," Sarji said.

"The demand is really huge. Some areas don't have water to drink and they need food," he said, adding that the sanctions "have badly affected the disaster."

"Imagine, no electricity, no fuel, nothing, in a very cold area," he said. "This is a critical time to inform the Western countries to remove the sanctions on Syria. It's enough. It's enough."