News

NCR Vatican correspondent Christopher White; Kate McElwee, executive director of the Women's Ordination Conference and Bishop John Stowe of Lexington, Kentucky, in a livestream event held March 14. (NCR screenshot/YouTube)

by Stephanie Yeagle

View Author Profile

syeagle@ncronline.org
Follow on Twitter at @ncrSLY

Join the Conversation

Send your thoughts to Letters to the Editor. Learn more

March 14, 2023

Share on BlueskyShare on FacebookShare on TwitterEmail to a friendPrint

NCR Vatican correspondent Christopher White hosted a discussion about the 10th anniversary of Pope Francis' pontificate with Kate McElwee, executive director of the Women's Ordination Conference and Bishop John Stowe of Lexington, Kentucky, focusing on the role of women in the Catholic Church, the upcoming synod on synodality, the clergy sexual abuse scandal and more.

More background:

- Pope Francis' 10-year record on women may not be the fireworks of change many pray for, but there has been movement, says McElwee.
- According to Stowe, Pope Francis is teaching us that the peace which the world cannot give will be produced by recognizing the dignity of the human person and the global fraternity that we are called to live.
- All of our coverage of the 10th anniversary of Pope Francis' pontificate can be found here.
- You can also keep up with our coverage of the synod on synodality here.

This story appears in the 10 years with Pope Francis feature series. View the full series.