

News

Newspapers hang on display for sale in Mexico City, Monday, Feb. 23, 2026, a day after the Mexican army killed Jalisco New Generation Cartel leader Nemesio Oseguera Cervantes, known as "El Mencho." (AP/Jon Orbach)

Fabioloa Sanchez

View Author Profile

Associated Press

View Author Profile

Join the Conversation

Send your thoughts to Letters to the Editor. Learn more

Mexico City — March 1, 2026

Share on BlueskyShare on FacebookShare on TwitterEmail to a friendPrint

Items found inside the final redoubt in Jalisco state of Nemesio Oseguera Cervantes, "El Mencho," who was killed by the Mexican army on Feb. 22, revealed a side to the feared cartel boss few would have imagined: his religious fervor.

The house inside an exclusive subdivision in southern Jalisco state contained a crucifix, as well as a makeshift altar with religious figurines of Our Lady of Guadalupe, St. Jude Thaddeus and St. Charbel Makhlouf, along with votive candles with images of saints. In the backyard, images of the Virgin Mary and St. Jude were carved into large rocks.

On Feb. 22, Mexican special forces encircled Oseguera Cervantes and captured him after a firefight on the outskirts of Tapalpa. The leader of the Jalisco New Generation Cartel died en route to hospital, authorities said.

Images of the house's inside captured by local media showed a handwritten copy of Psalm 91, which Catholics often invoke to ask God for protection from danger, fear and adversity.

There were also letters, apparently written to Oseguera Cervantes and addressing him familiarly, that made reference to St. Jude, who has a following among criminals, drug users and the marginalized in Mexico.

Drug culture and religion

Oseguera Cervantes maintained a low profile during the nearly two decades that he led the Jalisco cartel. The group was known for spectacular acts of violence and rapid growth, but little was known about his personal life.

Mexican authorities said they tracked one of his lovers to the hideout.

Trees and buildings dot Tapalpa, Mexico, Feb. 23, a day after the Mexican army killed Jalisco New Generation Cartel leader Nemesio Oseguera Cervantes, known as "El Mencho." (AP/Marco Ugarte)

For those who study drug culture like Fabián Acosta Rico, a researcher at the University of Guadalajara and the Center of Religious Studies in Mexico, his apparent religious devotion comes as no surprise.

"We cannot disentangle religion from violence," Acosta Rico said, noting that the world is full of such examples from the Bushido code of the samurai that included Buddhist beliefs to Italy's feared Cosa Nostra that often incorporated images of the Virgin Mary or a patron saint in its initiation rituals.

Acosta Rico said that in Oseguera Cervantes' case it is not so much a traditional Christian religious fervor, but rather a "popular religiousness, a religiousness of the immediate, of everyday life."

"Man goes to God not expecting forgiveness of sins, or salvation of his soul, but rather because he's hungry, because he's cold, because he feels attacked or threatened by danger," he said.

Mexican capos get religion

The links between drug trafficking and religious imagery are not new in Mexico, a majority Catholic country.

Advertisement

Mexico's Catholic Bishops Conference had previously questioned the use of religious imagery by criminal groups and openly rejected the Santa Muerte, "Holy Death," cult figure, which fuses pre-Hispanic and Catholic traditions into a representation of a cloaked skeleton that is not recognized by the Roman Catholic Church.

There are documented cases of drug traffickers like Édgar Valdez Villarreal, better known as "La Barbie," who according to journalist Anabel Hernández's book Emma and Other Narco Women, were deeply devoted to Mexico's patron saint, Our Lady of Guadalupe.

Ovidio Guzmán López, one of the sons of former Sinaloa Cartel leader Joaquín "El Chapo" Guzmán, was seen during his first capture in 2019 wearing a scapular of the Holy Infant of Atocha, a popular image of the Christ Child, around his neck.

Acosta Rico said there is little the Roman Catholic Church can do about the association of drug traffickers and religious imagery in these times of religious freedom. Any person "can, without a problem, use religious symbols as they please and according to their idea," he said.

"The church already lost its power to be able to implement standards and regulations on the use of religious symbols," he said.

Read this next: Anxiety among some religious in Mexico after violence erupts following drug lord killing