

Published on National Catholic Reporter (<https://www.ncronline.org>)

June 25, 2009 at 1:52pm

People of faith demand universal health care

by Jessie Abrams by Catholic News Service

Megan Lecluyse from Princeton, N.J., gets her blood pressure taken by Lynn Alila, a student nurse, at a June 24 interfaith event in Washington in support of universal health care. (CNS photo/Paul Haring)

WASHINGTON -- Washington's sweltering heat did its best to discourage people of faith from gathering at Freedom Plaza to participate in the Interfaith Service of Witness and Prayer for Health Care for All June 24.

Regardless of the weather, nearly 1,000 people convened between the White House and the Capitol -- armed with water bottles, umbrellas and matching paper fans bearing a message about reform -- to ensure politicians hear their calls for universal health care.

Sr. Simone Campbell, executive director of NETWORK, a national Catholic justice lobby, stood out from the crowd in a magenta dress and with her strong words in favor of health care change.

One of the final speakers, Campbell was not the first one to make specific health care demands. She insisted health care must be affordable and accessible to all, inclusive and accountable to all, and of good quality for all.

Campbell argued the time is now, saying the nation is aligned perfectly for changes in health care.

"In my experience it is rare when a moral stance, business necessity and political opportunity all coincide, but this is what we have now," said Campbell, a Sister of Social Service. "Faith and business are moving in the same direction. It is this confluence that brings us together this afternoon to make it known to our representatives that 'we the people' demand health care reform."

Calling the situation a "business necessity," she reminded the crowd of the wealth of America and pointed out the irony that one of the wealthiest nations in the world cannot afford to offer all its citizens realistic opportunities for health care.

She reminded the crowd of the healing touch of Christ and of the nation's responsibility to leave no one "untouched." Campbell also suggested it may be time for business and free market plans to step aside from health care issues.

"The marketplace has failed in the delivery of health care. We as a nation were foolish to think that health care can run on a completely free market model," Campbell said. "Health care is a ministry -- it is a faith-based action."

Judging from the event, people of all different faiths seemed to be taking action.

The event brought many different beliefs and ideologies together. Those with the Gamaliel Foundation, an endorser of the gathering, wore red shirts marked with the slogan "Faith & Democracy."

Prema Desai sang an opening Hindu prayer in Sanskrit; Rabbi David Saperstein gave an initial speech; and Claudina Pearl Harrison did a liturgical dance to show her Christian faith. More than 46 organizations ranging from religious groups to magazines endorsed the event.

"The faith community is a fundamental pillar that needs to come together to get health care for all and health care is something that people can really unite around," said Rachel Rosen DeGolia, director of the Universal Health Care Action Network founded in 1992.

Advertisement

She manned a booth which focused on developing resources to encourage dialogue between people of different faiths and also on giving people the skills to evaluate political proposals and ask questions of leaders.

The booth represented one of the endorsers of the interfaith program, Faithful Reform in Health Care, which recently branched off from the Universal Health Care Action Network.

DeGolia said she was encouraged by the number of people in the plaza but said health care reform was still a serious challenge. "We need major health care changes," she told Catholic News Service. "We are hoping that our policymakers hear what we're saying."

Some of those same policymakers are busy developing proposals for health care change on Capitol Hill. There are at least half a dozen health-related proposals already before Congress. One is called the Affordable Health Choices Act, which is based in part on the plan Massachusetts has in effect and would require individuals to purchase health insurance except in hardship cases.

As the son of a minister, House Majority Whip James Clyburn of South Carolina said he has always kept the issue of health care reform on his mind.

He told the crowd the story of coming home from school to tell his father he would not be continuing his education to become a minister. After taking three hours to complete the hourlong drive home, Clyburn said he can still remember his father's response. "Well, son," Clyburn's father said, "I guess they'd rather see a sermon than hear one."

Clyburn said it is this attitude he applies to his work in the House of Representatives. He said he hoped to tackle the issue of health care reform after Congress' weeklong Fourth of July recess.

Source URL (retrieved on 08/18/2017 - 12:31): <https://www.ncronline.org/news/justice/people-faith-demand-universal-health-care>

Links:

[1] <https://www.ncronline.org/donate?clickSource=article-end>