

Catholic schools in the news

Dennis Coday | Oct. 12, 2009 NCR Today

Catholic schools seem to be attracting a lot of media attention lately. Just today we see:

Catholic schools shift with the population [1] in the Philadelphia Inquirer: At the same time that the Archdiocese of Philadelphia is closing two venerable Catholic high schools in the city in June, it is preparing to open a new high school in the suburbs in the fall and plans to build another in a few years.

Looking for Solutions to the Catholic School Crisis [2] in Time magazine: He is neither old, nor a priest, nor particularly attached to time-honored traditions. At 35, John Eriksen, one of the nation's youngest Catholic school superintendents, offers a ruthless assessment of parochial education. "The biggest threat that urban Catholic schools face is nostalgia."

And over on Hollyscoop.com: Suri Cruise to Attend Catholic School [3]. While Tom is a huge advocate for Scientology, their daughter will be raised a Catholic, just like her Mommy Katie Holmes.

Source URL (retrieved on 05/23/2017 - 06:48): <https://www.ncronline.org/blogs/ncr-today/catholic-schools-news>

Links:

[1] http://www.philly.com/inquirer/local/20091011_Catholic_schools_shift_with_the_population.html

[2] <http://www.time.com/time/nation/article/0,8599,1929589,00.html>

[3] http://www.hollyscoop.com/tom-cruise/suri-cruise-to-attend-catholic-school_21766.aspx