

Oblate Sisters in Need

Maureen Fiedler | Nov. 25, 2009 NCR Today

I remember well the summer of 1970, when I worked in the "sea island" area of South Carolina. People lived in shacks, and lacked many of the necessities of life. I lived in a convent of the Oblate Sisters of Providence that summer, and they taught me how to behave in that predominantly African-American community in the rural South. I learned a great deal from them, and we had some great times together.

I have known several Oblate Sisters of Providence over the years, and they do wonderful work wherever they go. They were founded as an African-American community in the days of segregation, and are still predominantly (although not exclusively) African-American. Their ministries have focused on the urban poor, and their work is treasured in those communities.

But now, I discovered that they are need themselves, hit hard by the recession. Their story was in today's Washington Post [1].

Source URL (retrieved on 07/26/2017 - 19:52): <https://www.ncronline.org/blogs/ncr-today/oblate-sisters-need>

Links:

[1] <http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2009/11/24/AR2009112403883.html>