

Taking on incivility

Thomas C. Fox | Nov. 30, 2009 NCR Today

E.J. Dionne Jr., in the Washington Post [1] today writes that "the most surprising and disappointing aspect of our politics is how little pushback there has been against the vile, extremist rhetoric that has characterized such a large part of the anti-Obama movement."

I concur. It is disappointing, especially when one believes that civility is a mark of a mature democracy and should characterize U.S. politics.

Dionne explains: "Republican politicians, worried about future primary fights, have been reluctant to pick a fight with a radical right that seems to be the most energized section of their party. Their 'moderation' has consisted of a non-benign neglect of the extremists and of accusing the president merely of 'socialism.'"

Meanwhile, John Gehring, media director and senior writer for the Washington-based Catholics in Alliance for the Common Good has contributed to a book on the subject of civility, Christian Civility in an Uncivil World. The book was recently reviewed in the Post and Courier newspaper [2] in Charleston, SC.

---

Source URL (retrieved on 05/24/2017 - 16:48): <https://www.ncronline.org/blogs/ncr-today/taking-incivility>

Links:

[1] <http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2009/11/29/AR2009112902014.html>

[2] <http://www.postandcourier.com/news/2009/nov/29/essays-discussion-on-civility/>