

Commissioner likely to oversee Legion of Christ

John L. Allen Jr. | Apr. 13, 2010

Rome

As a Vatican-sponsored investigation of the Legionaries of Christ reaches its end-game, the leading hypothesis in Rome appears to be that Pope Benedict XVI may appoint a special "commissioner" to lead the order through a period a reform.

The appointment would, in effect, amount to a compromise between total suppression of the Legionaries, as some of the order's fiercest critics have suggested, and a papal "certificate of good conduct," as some of its Vatican backers had initially hoped.

While it's not clear what might happen with the order's current leadership team under this scenario, an April 13 piece in Corriere della Sera suggested that a commissioner would have "full powers" to make decisions in the name of the pope.

Read the full report here: Commissioner seen as likely outcome of Legionary investigation [1]

Support independent reporting on important issues.

Source URL (retrieved on 06/27/2017 - 07:22): <https://www.ncronline.org/news/commissioner-likely-oversee-legion-christ>

Links:

[1] <http://ncronline.org/node/17836>

[2] <https://www.ncronline.org/donate?clickSource=article-end>