

New study: when waterboarding ceased to be torture

Tom Roberts | Jul. 1, 2010 NCR Today

There's a fascinating new study out of Harvard's John F. Kennedy School of Government that's the subject of a story on Salon.com [1].

According to the Salon piece: "This new study examines how waterboarding has been discussed by America's four largest newspapers over the past 100 years, and finds that the technique, almost invariably, was unequivocally referred to as "torture" -- until the U.S. Government began openly using it and insisting that it was not torture, at which time these newspapers obediently ceased describing it that way." The study itself can be found here [1].

Source URL (retrieved on 07/28/2017 - 01:32): <https://www.ncronline.org/blogs/ncr-today/new-study-when-waterboarding-ceased-be-torture>

Links:

[1] http://www.salon.com/news/opinion/glenn_greenwald/2010/06/30/media