

Good Guy Randy Edsall

Michael Sean Winters | Sep. 2, 2010 | Distinctly Catholic

College football season is about to begin. This, like the start of college basketball season, brings a smile to my face. I am not such a fan of professional sports where the egos seem to get in the way of a good game with more than a little regularity. But, college football is a great game, especially when you can attend in person but kicking back and watching it on television is not a bad way to spend a Saturday either.

A few years ago, heading into the gym at Catholic University, I ran into Athletic Director Mike Allen. He was walking with Randy Edsall, the coach of the University of Connecticut football team, and he introduced and we passed a few moments in conversation. I grew up about twenty minutes from the UConn campus so I know it well and a friend of mine played football for Edsall a few years back. He seemed like a great guy.

Well, I just got this article [1] which shows my first impression was a correct impression. Edsall really shows how it is possible to push back against some of the cultural forces that threaten to turn college athletics into little more than a staging area for the pros. And, he has managed to revitalize his football program in the process. Sometimes, good guys do finish first.

Source URL (retrieved on 07/23/2017 - 18:16): <https://www.ncronline.org/blogs/distinctly-catholic/good-guy-randy-edsall>

Links:

[1] http://sports.espn.go.com/ncf/preview10/columns/story?columnist=maisel_ivan&id=5497647