

E.J. Dionne on why conservatives have abandoned 'community'

Tom Roberts | May. 27, 2012 NCR Today

Here's a bit of the column published today:

Conservatism today places individualism on a pedestal, but it originally arose in revolt against that idea. As the conservative thinker Robert A. Nisbet noted in 1968, conservatism represented a ?reaction to the individualistic Enlightenment.? It ?stressed the small social groups of society? and regarded such clusters of humanity ? not individuals ? as society?s ?irreducible unit.?

True, conservatives continue to preach the importance of the family as a communal unit. But for Nisbet and many other conservatives of his era, the movement was about something larger. It ?insisted upon the primacy of society to the individual ? historically, logically and ethically.?

Because of the depth of our commitment to individual liberty, Americans never fully adopted this all-encompassing view of community. But we never fully rejected it, either. And therein lies the genius of the American tradition: We were born with a divided political heart. From the beginning, we have been torn by a deep but healthy tension between individualism and community. We are communitarian individualists or individualistic communitarians, but we have rarely been comfortable with being all one or all the other.

A really valuable essay, read the entire piece here. [1]

Source URL (retrieved on 05/26/2017 - 23:45): <https://www.ncronline.org/blogs/ncr-today/ej-dionne-why-conservatives-have-abandoned-community>

Links:

[1] http://www.washingtonpost.com/opinions/conservatives-used-to-care-about-community-what-happened/2012/05/24/gJQAsR8inU_story.html?hpid=z3