

An exercise to help wrap the mind around the federal budget

Mary Ann McGivern | Jan. 11, 2013 NCR Today

It is difficult for most of us to maintain a sense of all the elements of the federal budget. We spent about $3.5 trillion in the last fiscal year. That's a difficult amount to get one's head around.

According to the Friends Committee on National Legislation, we spent $1.2 trillion in the last 10 years in Iraq and Afghanistan. According to Wikipedia, in 2011, we spent $725 billion on Social Security and $740 billion on the Defense Department. However, defense spending does not include another $10 billion or so spent by the Department of Energy on maintaining our nuclear arsenal, $48 billion for Homeland Security or $141 billion in Veterans Affairs expenditures, chiefly the cost of caring for our wounded soldiers, bringing the total to $949 billion. Interest on our debt totaled about a quarter of a trillion dollars. The dollars do add up.

Slate conducted a poll [1] on measures to reduce the deficit and pay down the debt. It is a useful exercise to help us think through these issues. However, I could not successfully reduce the budget within Slate's limits. I would have doubled the defense cuts instead of accepting some of Slate's options. Actually, my preferred cuts would be a lot deeper than that. That's why the Slate poll is useful. It helps us grasp what we are all hearing and trying to talk about.

---

Source URL (retrieved on 05/23/2017 - 05:56): <https://www.ncronline.org/blogs/ncr-today/exercise-help-wrap-mind-around-federal-budget>

Links:

[1]

http://www.slate.com/articles/news\_and\_politics/politics/2012/12/the\_best\_polling\_on\_how\_americans\_want\_to\_fix\_th