

Libertarianism Going Mainstream?

Michael Sean Winters | Apr. 8, 2013 Distinctly Catholic

James Hohmann, at Politico [1], makes the case that libertarianism is going mainstream. This is the scariest development in contemporary American politics and members of both political parties need to be on the alert, especially Catholics. You may find yourself agreeing with this or that policy, but the problem with libertarianism is at the root: When they say "human person," they understand that differently from the way orthodox Christians do. This is why Pope Pius XI, in his encyclical Quadragesimo Anno, referred to libertarian economics as a "poisoned spring." When you get the fundamentals wrong, everything that flows from it tends to be wrong. Focusing only on individual freedom as the first and foremost goal of politics, and understanding the human person in a hyper-individualistic way, demeans everything we Catholics believe about the common good, human flourishing, and the range of human values in any given culture. Libertarianism may be going mainstream, it may not, but it is dangerous in the extreme.

Source URL (retrieved on 07/23/2017 - 07:53): <https://www.ncronline.org/blogs/distinctly-catholic/libertarianism-going-mainstream>

Links:

[1] <http://www.politico.com/story/2013/04/libertarianism-89697.html?hp=r6>