

German bishops' head meets pope about case of 'luxury bishop'

Cindy Wooden Catholic News Service | Oct. 17, 2013
Vatican City

The president of the German bishops' conference said he was "strengthened and encouraged" by his discussion with Pope Francis about the case of a German bishop under fire for a massive building project that critics have denounced as extravagant.

Archbishop Robert Zollitsch, the bishops' conference president and recently retired archbishop of Freiburg, told reporters Thursday he would not share details of his meeting with Pope Francis that day because it was confidential.

The archbishop said a commission he formed to investigate the project in the diocese of Limburg would begin its audit Friday.

"After my meeting today with Pope Francis, I can assure you that all sides are interested in a good and speedy solution in order to bring tranquility back to the diocese of Limburg and to find a way out of this difficult situation," the archbishop said.

The head of the Limburg diocese, Bishop Franz-Peter Tebartz-van Elst, had been in Rome since Sunday, but as of Thursday, his name had yet to appear on any list of people received by the pope.

Tebartz-van Elst has been a target of protests for allegedly spending close to $40 million in renovations and new construction on his residence and diocesan offices, and for allegedly making false statements in court.

Zollitsch had told reporters Monday that he expected the bishop to do some serious "self-examination."

"It is not my place to judge the bishop of Limburg, but I am convinced he will undergo the necessary self-examination in the light of this situation," said Zollitsch, who was in Rome for the plenary meeting of the Pontifical Council for Promoting New Evangelization and for a regularly scheduled meeting with the pope as head of the bishops' conference.

Zollitsch had said it was obvious that the situation in Limburg would be one of the topics of his meeting with the pope.

"I take the situation in Limburg very seriously," Zollitsch told reporters Monday.

Tebartz-van Elst has been accused of living extravagantly while cutting diocesan programs, and critics have suggested that the renovation and construction project may have been funded in an improper way.

The investigating commission, Zollitsch said, includes experts in canon law, finance and construction. The members were asked to "clarify the costs" of the project, "how it was financed" and "how decisions were made to finance it." Canon requires such large expenditures to be approved by a diocesan finance council or the Vatican.

Regarding a separate allegation involving alleged luxury, a state prosecutor in Hamburg issued an indictment against Bishop Tebartz-van Elst on Oct. 10, claiming he had given false testimony in court. The bishop had sued the magazine Der Spiegel for an article alleging he had flown first class on a trip to India for charity work.

The German media, which often refer to Tebartz-van Elst as the "luxury bishop," have been following him closely and frequently mention Pope Francis' simple lifestyle as a contrast.

In early September, Cardinal Marc Ouellet, prefect of the Congregation for Bishops, sent retired Cardinal Giovanni Lajolo to visit the diocese to promote peace between the bishop and some of the diocese's priests. In the end, the bishop agreed to publish figures about the construction project and to cooperate with the bishops' conference commission.

---

Support independent reporting on important issues.

---

Source URL (retrieved on 06/27/2017 - 09:34): <https://www.ncronline.org/news/global/german-bishops-head-meets-pope-about-case-luxury-bishop>

Links:

[1] <https://www.ncronline.org/donate?clickSource=article-end>